

I choose to prove my understanding of the Irish proverb “ The work praises the man” by giving an illustration of a wonderful person I know.

He started a business, risking failure and showing courage. He started a great family and supports them faithfully. His many Christian values are numerous, and he is a great example.

His business, a company that grows fruit and is involved in other agricultural work, is a model of his hard work. He began this business because he was willing to take a chance. It started as an unimportant small company and has evolved to a largely respected, family owned business. How hard it is to imagine how he worked to bring this business to success! He doesn't need to brag about his virtues and qualities, because people can see them.

Another example is that of his large family. He has three sons and many grandchildren, who follow his cause faithfully. Four of his grandchildren are out of college thanks to him. He supports five other families in his business because his sons and another friend have joined it. Just he has a reason to be proud, his family is proud of him!

The real reason I am proud of him is because he is my own Grandpa. I think that the proverb “ The work praises the man” fits my Grandpa perfectly because of his wonderful and virtuous self. His case of entrepreneurship is a great lesson to follow. His illustrations of virtues and charity are obvious to everyone; he doesn't tell anyone about himself, they find out from people who respect him.
